DESCRIPTION

Because employers are always seeking the best talent to drive business success, those with global workforces with a cross-border component are increasingly permitting flexible working arrangements. While this "jobs to people" approach may satisfy business objectives with minimal upfront cost, employers should be mindful of employment law considerations, such as which country's employment laws are controlling. Additionally, employers should consider the interplay of multiple payroll tax withholding and reporting requirements, including additional costs such as tax equalization, and the methods used by tax agencies to enforce their rules. This webinar will explore the employment and tax law considerations for three common types of off-site workers:

- Remote workers: those working from home in another country
- Mobile executives: those spreading their workweek across more than one country
- Secondments: those working in another country for a fixed period
